Storing Your Will

Tip – Store your will in a safe place where your Personal Representative can find it.

Storing your will is a critical step after signing. Once you've signed your will, proper storage is crucial for ensuring your wishes are carried out smoothly.

Choose a safe, accessible location to store your original will where it won't be damaged by fire, water, or other hazards.

Good options include:

- A fireproof home safe
- A secure filing cabinet in your home

Inform your Personal Representative by letting him or her know exactly where your will is located. Without this knowledge, they may spend valuable time searching for it when they should be focusing on settling your estate. Consider providing them with:

- The specific location of the will
- Any access codes or keys needed
- A copy of your will for their records (while keeping the original secure)

Do not store your original will in a bank safety deposit box. This creates a legal catch-22: your personal representative typically cannot access the box until they're officially appointed by the court, but they cannot be appointed until they present the original will to the court.

In Idaho, Courts require the original will for informal probate proceedings.

Copies, while useful for your records, cannot substitute for the original document.

I know of a case where the Personal Representative had a copy of a will but could not find a valid original will. Instead of the decedent's property passing to his friends, stepdaughter, charitable organizations, and family as outlined in his will, it passed to the persons designated under Idaho Law to receive property as if there were no will, which was completely contrary to the decedent's intentions.

After signing your will, taking these simple steps will ensure that your final wishes can be executed without unnecessary delays or complications for your loved ones.
